Excerpt: . . . flying buttresses connecting these with the outer walls of the chapels of the lower church. The arches, however, abut upon the vertical buttresses at so low a point that the reinforcement they bring can hardly be very effective. The design of the interior is quite unlike that of any preceding building in Italy, yet it would be hard to point out its prototype in France, England, or Germany. The whole height is about sixty feet, yet such is the breadth of the arches which divide the wall that their height is nearly equal to that of the piers from which they spring. In each arch of the nave is a high and narrow two-light pointed window, the lights being separated, not by a column, as has heretofore been the invariable rule in Italy, but by a true Gothic chamfered mullion. A similar window occupies each face of the apse. In the transept ends this window is doubled, and the two pairs are brought together under a broad pointed bearing-arch with a quatrefoil in the head. The wall below the windows is broken only by the dividing piers, and is of superior thickness, so that at the point where the wall is thinned, sufficient breadth is left for a narrow gallery, which runs quite around the church, cutting through the masonry of the deep wall arches. In the side walls of transepts and choir, where there are no windows, this gallery is faced by a...
