The law is peculiar to Dutchess County but the conditions which it seeks to remedy are not peculiar to this locality. Dutchess County, from its geographical formation and the character of its inhabitants, is a typical New York State county, presenting within its boundaries those social problems which exist to a greater or less degree in other parts of the State. There are two cities within the county with their factories and other industries; small towns along the river with their floating, foreign population; prosperous farming sections; large estates; and backwoods regions where the condition of the people suggests that of the Kentucky mountaineer. Dutchess County is a New York State in miniature. Neither is this work being done in Dutchess County unique, as work along...
